

New Woman Violinist Plays With the Russian Symphony

Laya Luboshiz Makes a Favorable Impression—Glazunow's Eighth Symphony Dull.

THE Russian Symphony opened its fifth season at Carnegie Hall last night with the latest symphony by Glazunow—his eighth. It lacks, like so many of the Russian compositions that Mr. Altschuler so lovingly exploits for these exclusively Russian concerts, the quality of being interesting. One can admire the technical skill with which it is constructed and then wonder what it is all about. The four movements are marked Heroic, Fantastic, Pagan and Christian; but imagination must go far afield to catch their appropriateness.

After all, the feature of the concert was the first appearance in America of a new woman violinist, Laya Luboshiz, who chose that famous Tchaikowsky concerto in which to make her debut. She is tall and graceful, with most expressive eyes and a mobile, interesting face. Her bowing is broad and virile, but her intonation is not certain. The tone she produces is not large, but she has moments of touching appeal. Not, by this first performance, least, to be ranked with the highest, but a violinist whom it will be a pleasure to hear again in some composition less exciting and brilliant.

A group of seven of Leidlow's folk songs for orchestra proved delightful compositions, the third denoted as plaintive, being exquisite in its simplicity and tenderness. The playing of the solo violin and a men's chorus was highly creditable to them, as was much of their work throughout the evening. There was a fairly large audience that reserved most of its applause for the violinist, who was given a seven times.

A BISHAM RECITAL.

David Bispham's second song recital at Mendelsohn Hall yesterday afternoon was graced by the presence of his old opera associate Lillian Norfleet, Mrs. George Birrell and Richard Strauss, with some old English, Irish Scotch and Welsh songs.
